

Sussex-Southampton Initiative: SuShI. An interdisciplinary fusion.

Cite as: Martin Paul Eve, "Sussex-Southampton Initiative: SuShI. An interdisciplinary fusion.", eve.gd: Martin Paul Eve, May 21, 2012, <https://doi.org/10.59348/rgq10-m1w80>.

The third conference I attended last week was a day called SuShI. The idea was to bring together the humanities and business worlds. It was, from my extremely critical Leftist perspective, a somewhat strange event. I attended talks on advertising and creativity schematising business theorists. I have to say that, although left still not entirely persuaded by the contents of their papers, it was an extraordinary fusion. I have never seen papers on these elements sit side-by-side with a sociological appraisal calling for the rights of non-human actors to be recognised under international law. We had references to Ernst Bloch alongside papers on digital advertising. Anyway, for the record, here's the archive:

Featured image by betsyweber under a CC-BY license.