It's almost 2 years since I founded the open access journal Alluvium, which publishes short, topical articles written by leading academics on 21-century writing and 21st-century literary criticism. Launched in June 2012 with my colleague Dr Martin Eve, the journal has gone from strength to strength and its growing readership is spread across the globe. The journal has received praise from senior figures in literary scholarship, being called "a striking new presence on the critical scene" which features "some of the liveliest new voices in contemporary criticism." It has also been commended for "playing a role extending the geography of serious academic publishing" (for these and other endoresements, see here).

To celebrate its upcoming 2nd birthday, Alluvium editors and contributors will be hosting a special panel discussion (accompanied by drinks and birthday cake) on contemporary literary scholarship and digital, open-access publishing as part of Birkbeck's Arts Week 2014 programme. The session is titled "The Way We Read Now" and will take place on Tuesday 20th May 2014, from 7.40pm in The Peltz Gallery at 43 Gordon Square, London WC1H 0PD (see here for directions and a map of the venue).

Panel details:

Join us to discuss the way in which we read and research texts in the 21st century: what approaches and methods should we take? How can new digital technologies reframe our discussions online? And how are new forms of publishing changing 21st-century scholarship? The panel will consist of Dr Caroline Edwards (Lecturer in Modern & Contemporary Literature, Birkbeck), Dr Michael James Collins (Lecturer in American Literature, University of Kent), Dr Bianca Leggett (Visiting Lecturer, Birkbeck / Roehampton University), Dr Martin Eve (Lecturer in English, University of Lincoln), Dr Zara Dinnen (Lecturer in Modern & Contemporary Literature, University of Birmingham) and Dr Daniel O'Gorman (Visiting Lecturer, Royal Holloway). The panellists are editors and contributors to the critically-acclaimed journal of 21st-century literary criticism, Alluvium, which will be celebrating its 2nd birthday. Join us for informed discussion, insights into online publishing and setting up a journal, as well as celebratory drinks and cake. Suitable for anyone with an interest in contemporary literary criticism, publishing, and the future of online commentary and debate.
