

The Anxiety of Academia: Academics, Legitimation and Discipline in Contemporary Metafiction

Cite as: Martin Paul Eve, "The Anxiety of Academia: Academics, Legitimation and Discipline in Contemporary Metafiction", eve.gd: Martin Paul Eve, February 15, 2015, <https://doi.org/10.59348/g51s7-k5638>.

Since 2012, I have been slowly working on a book about contemporary metafiction. A lot of this work was done over weekends in the last year, as a break from the more practical undertakings that I do full-time in the week. The book was originally called “Metafiction After the Millennium” and was supposed to chart a type of post-postmodern (urgh) shift. As I’ve become more embroiled in the political economies of research publication, my interests have shifted and I became obsessed with the ways in which contemporary metafiction interacts with the academy. The book is really getting there now. As a cathartic exercise, though, I thought I'd share the current table of contents and a paragraph-by-paragraph outline of the introduction.

I also don't know if anyone else does this, but I find it really helpful to write a single line, nested-depth summary of what I've already written so that I can see whether, when written out, the argument makes sense and is connected. I will, probably, change some of this as the final iterations of the book come together. In the meantime, though, I hope this might be of interest to some, just to share what I am working on. I hope to publish the book with an open-access publisher when it's ready.

Table of Contents

Acknowledgements

Chapter One: Introduction

Part I: Critique

Chapter Two: Self-Canonisation and Aesthetic Critique

Chapter Three: Political Critique and the University in Roberto Bolaño's 2666

Part II: Legitimation

Chapter Four: Academic Fiction

Chapter Five: Legitimation and Academia in Jennifer Egan's Goon Squad

Part III: Discipline

Chapter Six: Class and the Academy in the Works of Sarah Waters

Chapter Seven: Living On: Ishmael Reed and the Postmodernists

Chapter Eight: Conclusion

Bibliography

Introduction

Tale of the Eloquent Peasant

History of text: Metafiction

Also highlights academics: disjunct of "praise" → punishment

Story designed for "educated" readers

Stakes of book

Legitimation of fiction against the academy

Ethics of metafiction

Metafiction claimed as politically abortive

Metafiction is part of all fiction

Metafiction is critique

Metafiction interlinked with university & in competition with English

Canon Wars: university weaker gatekeeper

Market canon processes: Eaglestone

Contemporary fiction appraises works once published

Linked to labour economy of the academy

English not market condition of possibility for lit

fiction

Metafiction and Morality

Targets: metafiction post-2000 and Anglo-American academic reading practices

Existing studies of metafiction

Reconfiguration by Mark Currie (after Robert Scholes)

Merger of fiction and criticism

Metafiction is critique

Academic attacks on metafiction are reflexive attacks

Metafiction linked to worldwide Theory-saturation of English programmes

US-specific context: "program era"

Zadie Smith's On Beauty

Scientism and objectifying aesthetics

Elaine Scarry

Cyclical satire vs. engagement with literary studies

Metafiction was never amoral

Thomas Pynchon's Gravity's Rainbow

Genealogies of contemporary power

The Emerging Archive and "The Contemporary"

Eaglestone's not-yet-problems

Ever-expanding emerging archive

Problem formation

Genealogy as solution

Colin Koopman's reading of genealogy: twin vectors for sites of change

Chart contemporary emergence as solution to twin problems

Vectors: academic reading practices and contemporary metafiction

Problems to which emergence responds

Canon: overbearingly white male

Value: claims too strong for academic contrib to literary market

Competition: fiction vs. criticism

Taxonomy of Anti-Academic Fiction

Purposes of taxonomies

Methodologies of exclusion

This book:

Not the campus novel

Representations at sites distant from the university

Dana Spiotta's Eat the Document

Pragmatic exclusions: everyone has another book about academics

Not books just by and for academics

These works:

Enact distant critiques of the university

Attempt to discipline the academy

Have an anxiety of academia

Geographical specificity not elided

Map of book

Post image by Joseph Wilson under a CC BY 3.0 license.